EDITORIAL

The Journal

We have now entered the twentieth year. Two decades are indeed a significant period in running a Journal without discontinuity or serious setbacks. Through the years the contents of the publication have passed through modifications, with the objective of providing more useful information to the readers in keeping with the recent trends in the development of electrochemistry and allied topics. All this has been possible due to increasing support and cooperation from members, subscribers, patrons, advertisers, publishers, reviewers, scientific organizations and industries, and others. Amongst the new features, mention may be made of: increase in the number of pages and change of format, abstracts – special, corrosion activities in India report, materials in the news, and pollution in the news.

With the continued cooperation from all sides, the Journal faces the year 1971 with the confidence of offering improved service in the years to come.
